Jeopardy is a game that tests contestants' knowledge, will, and ingenuity as they strive to further their scores and to defeat one another. Jeopardy also allows friends to get together and have fun! The American Institute of Chemical Engineering (AIChE) Jeopardy team is a close-knit group of chemical engineers that have fun competing in Jeopardy against each other and other teams. Also, Jeopardy is another way to study all things Chemical Engineering.

The club was founded in Spring 2018, and they have proven themselves to be successful in having fun. They recently went to the annual competition at the AIChE Southern Regional Conference, which was held at Louisiana State University (LSU). The captain of the AIChE Jeopardy team, Andrew Weaver, remarked that the freshman were “pulling their own weight” and emphasized that a winning team needs a balance of both underclassmen and upperclassmen. Weaver also highlighted the competitive spirit of the team members, but noted that everyone on the team gets along well.

The rules of Jeopardy are simple. Jeopardy can be played by an individual or in groups. The first team can pick the category and point value. Once the question is read, the first team that buzzes in can answer the question. Each question must be answered in a form of a question, such as “What is specific gravity?” If the answer is correct, then the points go towards the team that answered it correctly, and then they can pick another category and point value. If the answer is incorrect, then the amount of points the question is worth is deducted from the team, and the other teams have an opportunity to guess the answer.

The Jeopardy team is excited to welcome new members, and they are friendly to anyone who attends their meetings. By joining the team, you can make new friends, broaden your horizons, and get some extra help with your chemical engineering studies. Overall, the AIChE Jeopardy team is one of the best clubs you can join.
